

Value added by travel in Education. Is travel a necessary component of education or not? Will scholar sitting at home have more knowledge? Or Travel to study is over rated; we have brilliant scholars who studied locally. Is travel really required for higher studies?

Admittedly, people have divergent viewpoints regarding travelling for education abroad. Some people espouse that travelling internationally to pursue higher education is an excellent opportunity for many aspiring individuals, while others opine that it is just an exaggerated idea. This essay will discuss both sides of the spectrum and will reach to a plausible conclusion.

Needless to say, an imperative outlook in favour of travelling abroad for education is that overseas learners gained much experience than their counterpart because of being far from their genitors. What is more, a person outside his comfort zone is exposed to various cultural diversities which enable him to adapt different environment easily. To quote an instance, employers nowadays prefer candidates with international qualification which means they are prone to many job opportunities. Eventually, the international studies is more fruitful as it widens the horizon of an individual.

On the downside, opponents do not agree with the aforementioned statements and believe that universities abroad charge hefty tuition fee from international students. On top of it, student abroad become victim of homesickness which had negative influence on their social well-being. To exemplify in my knowledge it can be stated that, in order to survive in foreign countries, pupils have to work on part time basis which effect their studies. Ergo, study abroad is too expensive for both students and parents.

Summing it up, even though studying abroad has some subtle negative aspects, but it contributes to the person's personal, social and economic growth.
