

Does personality describe the person? To what extent do you agree or disagree?

Without a doubt, people have divergent viewpoints regarding the life that a person leads depends on the personality. Some are either fascinated by the notion of education and economic status which play crucial roles in individual's life while others are apprehensive about their characteristics values which they opine shaped by life experience and family. However, I am inclined to advocate that individuals' lives are impacted by all these factors, and this essay will discuss both ends of the spectrum in the forthcoming paragraphs.

Apparently, an imperative perspective in favour of this topic is that characteristics of a person contribute greatly to individual's life, due to the fact that it influences a person's decision-making process, interaction with others and identity. The New York Times sets an example by conducting a research which revealed that extroverted people shop through discussion and communication with sales or friends, whereas introverted individuals use catalogues or ask their family for advice. What is more, 73% of socializer (extroverted) live near city and prefer to work in office, while 86% of solitary (introverted) people work at home and enjoy living in country side. Eventually, personalities affect the way people choose to accomplish their goals and live their lives.

On the downside, evidences also suggest that education and financial factor have significant effect on individual's life. To quote an instance, an erudite person often works in management position and has more choices in their lives, while people without education mostly earn their livings through physical works with limited access to public benefits. On top of it, 85% of learners with undergraduate degree have chances to travel aboard, but only 55% of students with high school certificate have similar experiences according to one of the studies which I conducted during universities. Consequently, individual's life is also shaped by their economic status and educational background.

In my final analysis, even though personalities play virtual factor (nearly described but not completely) in determining one's life, however the importance of education backgrounds and economic status shall not be ignored.
